Receiving the compliments of all the great lords of provinces, who came to congratulate his return, he made a solemn feast; and then went to Samarkand, where his arrival was celebrated with great rejoicings. He gave the sharifs, and men of letters, part of the spoil he had brought home; punished bad governors, against whom complaints were made; and exempted all the subjects of his empire from taxes for three years. In spring 799, Timur ordered the palace of Baghi-shemal to be built, in a garden to the north of Samarkand. It had a pavilion at each of the four corners; and the walls were painted in fresco. The court was paved with marble; and the walls, both within and without, were covered with porcelain. When the whole was finished, Timur held a royal festival, with sumptuous banquets, plays, and diversions;...
