The statement may be made respecting all the persons to whom the following letters were addressed, which the editor is requested to make by one of them, that a natural shrinking has been felt at the idea of revealing to the eyes of strangers the words of a friend, penned with all the freedom of confiding intercourse. No temptation would induce one to overstep the path of fidelity to the dead, while allusions to the living, inwrought with the correspondence, increased the difficulty. Yet it was felt to be essential to retain, to the limit that fidelity and honor would allow, the delicate finish of personal expression, which constitutes one of the charms of these fresh, spirited, and genial letters. The Editor can desire nothing more, than that the task of selection from the large number of letters received, may...
